

http://www.oregonlive.com/silicon-forest/index.ssf/2015/06/intels\_layoff\_letter\_we\_have\_m.html

This article explains a letter that the Intel Corporation sent to their employees that they are laying off throughout their company. Due to a budget cut based on reduced PC sales, Intel has decided to layoff many people throughout the company in Oregon's Washington County. Job cuts among the employees were primarily selected in regards of each employee's annual review process. Along with all that has been previously stated, Intel's layoff letter has also included information about what each employee will finally be receiving from the company.

The information presented in this article relates to the topic at hand because it discusses about unemployment, in ways such as how they present being let go to their employees, reasons why, and what they will finally be receiving as an employee and what they will be giving as an employer/company. In relation to the class, Intel's layoff letter is a direct example of business writing. It may not be the most enjoyable types of writing one could do and/or read, but it is what it is unfortunately among the industry. An exposure to an aspect of the overall subject of unemployment may be a very well respected interest to students in our class overall.