RESEACH PROCESS

Honestly my research process consisted of taking in consideration what the given topic was, and conducting an online search by using Google. Then I would usually just simply look though the links outlined on my web browser, and choose the article that was most appealing to me and also one that seemed to be represented through a decently credible source, especially since that has been highly suggested recommendation for these Biz Buzz discussions. That being said, I do believe the articles that I have chosen were credible. I also would usually read up on the writer(s) and/or contributor(s) of the articles I found before actually reading and using the articles to make sure the articles did come from a credible source.

UNEXPECTANCIES

I did find it somewhat difficult at times to find a decent article to use in a couple of the discussions. At times, the information I would type into a Google search bar, would not generate articles that I found of great interest. It took a couple of times of rephrasing of what I wanted to search for until I found an article that I found relevant and interesting to use.

I do not recall finding any surprises though through my research, but I did find it astonishing of what others had researched for their posts. Most of the articles that I did read posted by others, I have found very intriguing to read, which I did find surprising in that sense.

FAVORITE ARTICLE

My favorite article would have to be a Disney related article that I have posted for the third Biz Buzz discussion regarding problems in the workplace. That article would have to be my favorite because I found it interesting how being a highly popular company can cause an actual great issue, being that the article discussed about how Disney was trying to redesign the way their Disney Parks sold tickets to their consumers.

FOUNDED DISCOVERIES

I found how actually researching and sharing such information to others is really valuable. Being able and practicing presenting what you have discovered being relevant to your peers professionally is important, and also a valued skill to have in a workplace, which I have developed by doing these Biz Buzz post throughout this term. I appreciate such practice.
